I think that every yearbook staff must begin with high aspirations. You always want your book to be a little better than the year before, and you always vow not to make the same mistakes as the previous staff. It's not until you get into the thick of things and you're faced with one crisis after another that you realize you're not immune to those mistakes. When you're faced with a deadline and only 24 hours left to meet it, you begin to make compromises.

Certainly the 1982 Microcosm has its ups and downs, and I am sure that there must be some errors in the copy--after all, most of the proofreading was done on Christmas Eve under the tree. But on the whole, the editorial staff feels it is a unique publication. We apologize for any mistakes or omissions.

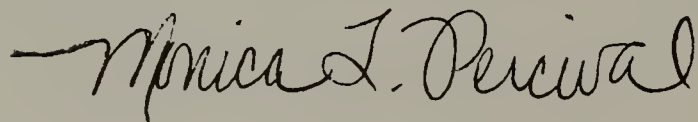

This issue commemorates the 80th anniversary of the College. In 1902, the first group of women entered Simmons and began traditions which still play a part in our lives today. A special scrapbook section in this yearbook is dedicated to those women and the spirit with which they sought to advance their education in a reluctant society.

It is also worthy to note that this year's book was typeset totally inhouse at Simmons. The typesetting, photography, writing, design, and layout were all done by staff members. I would like to thank them for their enthusiasm and effort.

In addition, I would like to thank the staff of the College Archives for their help in researching background material and obtaining photographs; the Office of Public Information for supplying some of the faculty pictures we were missing; and most especially, our advisor Deborah Smiley for help above and beyond the call of duty which allowed me to get through this project with some amount of sanity intact.

I hope you enjoy the 1982 Microcosm, but if you do have any complaints call 555-1212.

Sincerely,

“There are only moments. They like to tell us that time runs along in even, ticking measures, minute to day to month to decade, but that isn’t true. It’s like a groping journey in the fog, hiking up Bootspur Trail on Mount Washington in bad weather, nothing around you but the rocks of the trail and the ghostly shadows of the firs—and all at once you reach the summit and it’s blown clear and the sun is blazing down out of a vibrant, rain-washed sky and everything is new and full of clarity; and time does have a stop, just as the great man said. Moments like that, few and far between, clearings in the fog, on the high ground.”

FACULTY

William J. Holmes
President

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT
SIMMONS COLLEGE

To The Class of 1982:

At a time and in an edition dedicated to "changes" it may be consoling to think about what remains unchanged. Most importantly, you. The same intelligence, energy and integrity which brought you here and which made you stay productive, will be there to be called upon after graduation; and you will have more years of experience and maturity to help you make even better use of these abilities.

You will be on your own, but you will have been on your own these past years; you will probably have to support yourself, but in a de facto way that is what you have done here.

So think beyond survival; not how do I stay alive out there, but what do I want to do, where do I want to be and with whom? What do I find interesting, stimulating and satisfying? How do I continue to grow; where is this all going to come out? This growth did not begin at Simmons and it should not end here. When you finally say "I have arrived" where do you want to be?

Simmons, like Eliot's hippopotamus, also remains. Do not forget us here: we will continue to be a part of you, and you of us.

Yours,

William J. Holmes

SIMMONS COLLEGE

300 THE FENWAY
BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS 02115

OFFICE OF THE DEAN

November 16, 1981

Dear Seniors,

When you agreed to become members of the Simmons College Community, you made a commitment to join a community of scholars whose primary objective was to provide an environment in which you could become competent, self-confident, and responsible members of the larger community. To meet those objectives, a number of difficult challenges were placed before you, not the least of which were the mastery of a discipline, independent learning, and the broadening of your intellectual interests.

How well you have succeeded in taking the best from this community will be tested in time. Will you be sensitive to the values of our various societies; will you be responsive to people unlike yourselves; will you be capable of approaching complex problems from different perspectives; will you find stimulation in art, music, and poetry? Equally important will be your ability to provide leadership for your new communities and your determination to seek new knowledge and new resolutions to old problems.

Your membership in our community takes new direction upon your graduation. What Simmons is in the future depends in large part on how successful we were together in "inspiring in you the self-confidence and spirit of independence that will permit you to lead rich personal lives and give you competence to become useful members of society." We will grow and change as you evaluate the meaning of your Simmons education.

Our pride in your past successes is matched only by our confidence in your future.

Success and best wishes,

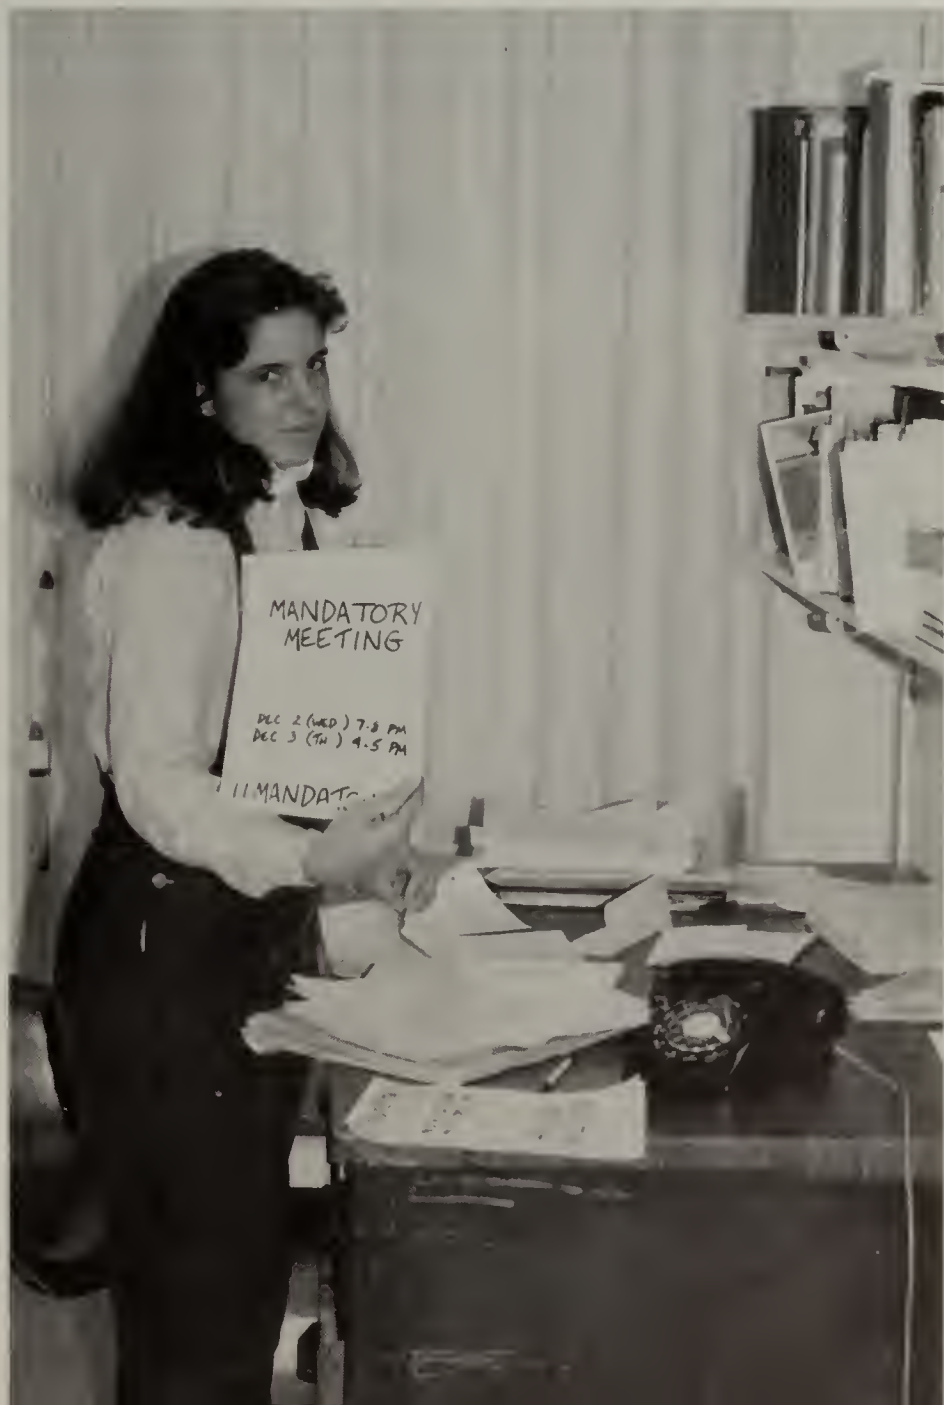

Charlotte Morocco

AFRO-AMERICAN STUDIES

Changing social influences and attitudes outside the Simmons community helped establish the now twelve-year-old Afro-American Studies Program.

The goals that the program had in 1970 have not changed. The program was designed to increase the visibility of Afro-American studies throughout the Simmons curriculum; improve coordination of required courses; provide support for organized student activities; increase the availability of resources for students seeking academic and personal advice; and to develop a collection of important resource materials.

"The Afro-American experience has been infused into many courses and programs in the Simmons College curriculum," said Director, Floyd Barbour. "This program has helped stimulate the continuing development of courses and research in this area."

AMERICAN STUDIES

American Studies became a course of study throughout many of the nation's educational institutions about 40 years ago. A course on the Jacksonian period, taught jointly by the English and history departments, marked the beginning of the American Studies Program at Simmons. Richard Sterne, Professor of English, was responsible for developing the program in 1967.

"The program is interdepartmental. Anything taught that has to do with the American way of life is part of the program," said Mr. Sterne.

Program courses include music, art, English literature, history, economics, and government. Graduates of the program enter careers as researchers, museum curators, and educators.

A brochure is currently being developed to advertise the program. "Some people don't know we're here," said Mr. Sterne. "The brochure will make the program and what it has to offer more visible to students."

Richard C. Sterne, Coordinator

APPLIED COMPUTER SCIENCE

This is the first year of existence for the Applied Computer Science Program at Simmons. Although computer science courses have been offered since 1967, previously there was no concentration available in this area.

Students in the program investigate the applications of computers in other fields of study such as management, communications, chemistry or psychology.

Co-coordinator of the department, Edward Prenowitz, believes that "the program will grow. Students who concentrate in some other field will take computer courses to broaden their education."

The program instructs students how to use, design, and program different computers and systems. There are three parts to their education; these include a core of computer science courses, a project in which computer techniques are used to solve a problem in another concentration, and an independent study done during senior year.

Mr. Prenowitz remarked that, "People use computers in all jobs. This program will train people who can communicate with both computers and other professionals in their workplace."

Margaret Menzin, Coordinator

Edward Prenowitz, Coordinator

ART AND MUSIC

The Department of Art and Music came into existence in 1964. At that time there were two instructors teaching both art and music history courses.

In 1967, Thomas Wallace, now chairperson of the department, came to Simmons to begin a studio art course. "At that time, there were practically no facilities. Now there are three studios on the fourth floor and a graphics workshop on the second floor of the Main College Building," said Mr. Wallace.

The music facilities have also expanded. In 1964, there was one practice room which was behind what is now the gym. Today there are two practice rooms on the fourth floor. Simmons also has an affiliation with the New England Conservatory of Music which has enabled a wider range of courses to be offered.

BIOLOGY

Students are constantly asking questions and that's very good. There are reasons for the question 'why?' and that helps us to change," said N. Sandra Williams, Chairperson of the Department of Biology.

With the completion of the Park Science Center, the department has improved its facilities and the instruments available for teaching.

The department offers students a basic knowledge of math, chemistry, and biology. Students can use this knowledge in careers as researchers or instructors, or in preparing for graduate and medical school.

Ms. Williams comments, "We don't want to make students just carriers of knowledge but also users of knowledge, since that interaction is important." She adds, "We want students to know and understand how to do things. We don't want them to research and experiment just for the experience, but in order to understand how to do it. The end result is not as important as their way of thinking."

CHEMISTRY

In 1902, there was one general science concentrator at Simmons College and chemistry was a course, not a department with its own labs and equipment.

After World War II, according to Dr. Peter Bowers, department chairperson, the field of chemistry changed. There were more sophisticated instruments available and calculations that once took hours to do now only took a few moments. Then came the computer, and the field of chemistry changed again.

Dr. Bowers said, "In 1974 the first lecture to my freshman class was on the use of the slide rule. Now we just assume that everyone has a calculator. You're lucky if you can even find a slide rule in the stores."

With the completion of the science building, the department moved from cramped labs and offices in the Main College Building to the spacious labs located on the third floor of the science building. Because of the new facilities, the department has been able to emphasize lab work in the curriculum. Simmons graduates have a good reputation both locally and nationally for excellence in lab and research work.

"We teach with more relevance today," explained Dr. Bowers. "We draw examples from our energy and environmental problems. The basics are still the same but computers have added a new dimension to the study of chemistry. I wouldn't like to see a chemistry concentrator graduate without knowing how to run a computer."

COMMUNICATIONS

Although developed as an off-shoot of the Department of English in 1930, the Department of Communications is still in its embryonic stages. Each year the department continues growing to meet today's technological demands. The working philosophy is to provide students with a solid foundation of academic skills that are readily adaptable in the job market.

Courses such as Journalism, Copy and Proof, Public Relations, and Graphic Arts Production offer mechanical fundamentals in preparation for more specialized courses such as Graphic Design, Cinematography, Advertising, and Article Writing. Field experiences and internships enable students to expand in-school training as well as provide stepping stones for job placement. Alden Poole, Professor of Journalism, remarks that "graduates from the department who have been in the work force for a few years are now forming networks for current graduate placement. They remain fiercely loyal to the department."

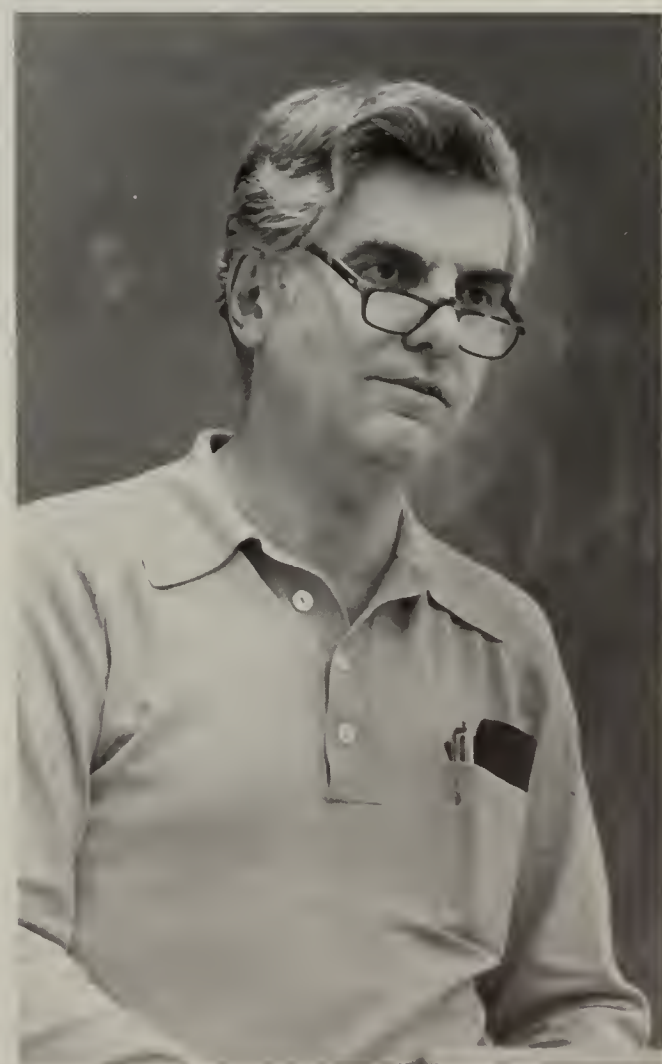

As enrollment continues to grow so will the department in its methods of instruction, the courses it offers, and the facilities available to students.

ECONOMICS

Every well-informed person should take an economics course. Economic literacy is important today, you see it every time you pick up a newspaper," said Harriet Tolpin, Chairperson of the Department of Economics.

In 1902, the only economics a Simmons student could study was household economics. The economics taught at the College today has little to do with home management and cooking. Now economics tackles such problems as unemployment, tax hikes, and inflation.

The department has expanded a great deal since it was a part of the Social Sciences Department which also included government and history. Ms. Tolpin believes that "there are more opportunities for women in economics opening up in the public and the private sectors. The interest and impact in economics has grown and so has the need to be informed about it."

EDUCATION

When Georgia Noble came to Simmons in 1963, she had an office in the basement of the building with bars across the window.

In the late sixties the department grew in importance. The population of children was growing and new schools were being built. There was a demand for secondary education teachers. At this time, it was probably the largest department in the College.

Now, in 1982, Ms. Noble has a comfortable office on the third floor of the Main College Building. "The emphasis in education has broadened in the last few years," commented Ms. Noble. "Students are now being trained to understand the wide range of needs that exist in the classroom, the impact of a multi-racial community, and the importance of understanding the different cultures of the world."

ENGLISH

When English Department Chairperson, Charles E. L'Homme came to Simmons in 1954, there was no such thing as an English major.

"At that time, the College was divided into schools and English was part of the Language, Literature and Arts School," explained Mr. L'Homme. The College did away with the separate schools in 1965 and the Department of English was established in 1967.

From 1954 to 1965, interest and courses experienced a tremendous growth. At the high point of interest, in the sixties, Simmons had a more diverse offering of English and literature courses than anywhere else in the country.

After the slack of the seventies, the number of English majors has begun to grow again. The department has stimulated interest with the addition of a writing option.

"Concentrating in English does not prepare you for any one job," said Mr. L'Homme. "It makes you capable of adjusting to many. What is important is the inter-relationship of disciplines."

FOREIGN LANGUAGES AND LITERATURES

In the late seventies, learning a foreign language was thought to be a social unnecessary, like dancing.

In 1949 Spanish, French, and German were offered at Simmons. Later Latin, Italian, Russian, and Hebrew were added but interest in them and practical use has declined so that they are no longer part of the curriculum.

The interest in learning a second language was stimulated under President Parks in the late fifties and early sixties. At that time, there were no foreign language majors although it was strongly recommended that students have a solid knowledge of another language.

The popularity of the department was at its peak in the early seventies but has since declined. "Today, I see the pendulum swinging back the other way," commented James L.V. Newman, Professor of French. "Now a second language is thought to be necessary, especially in bilingual urban areas, banks, businesses, and hospitals."

GOVERNMENT

The Department of Government was a division of the School of Social Sciences until 1965 when the College did away with the schools and set up individual departments. The department now has four full time faculty members and a growing enrollment.

Within the past few years, concern with foreign policy and international relations has increased student interest. Decisions of foreign governments effect our lives every day. Government policy also effects business and economics.

"Students take government courses to better understand the world around them," said Deborah Miner, Chairperson of the department. "We also offer students a comparative look at other world governments. It is important for students to understand other governments."

Government concentrators are encouraged to undertake research projects and internships in government related areas. Students are able to undertake careers in social services, government agencies, law, politics, and research.

Deborah Miner; Chairperson, Carroll French Miles

HISTORY

The Department of History was once part of the School of Social Sciences, but became a separate discipline in the 1960's. Afro-American Studies has been added to the curriculum but the basic concentration requirements haven't changed.

According to department Chairperson, Mark Solomon, "The number of history concentrators varies with external factors, such as the economy and political activism."

In the past, women majoring in history usually went into teaching. Today, a history background prepares a student for careers in law, city planning, and government services.

Mr. Solomon remarked, "There are more career opportunities for women. There are openings in law and government."

HEALTH SCIENCES

If there have been any changes in the health sciences, physical therapy and medical technology, it is that there are more men entering those fields. In the past, these have traditionally been fields open almost exclusively to women.

The Physical Therapy Program originated at Harvard Medical School just after World War I. The program was open to women who already had degrees but who wanted specific physical therapy training.

In 1946, physical therapy became a conjoint program of Simmons College and the Children's Hospital Medical Center and was redesigned for undergraduates. The first class to receive a baccalaureate degree and a certificate in physical therapy graduated in 1949.

The program's clinical affiliations were expanded in 1973 to include 47 facilities. Before that time, students were trained exclusively for working with children. Today, the role of the physical therapist has expanded and there is more specialization. Students are trained to work with adults as well as with children.

"The p.t. students are the best in the college.

It takes a very high quality student to make it through the program," said Dr. Ann Coghlan, Dean of Sciences. "The program has expanded and it has been a good expansion. The education has been broadened. It's important for students to be able to relate to adults, too. To limit clinical experiences to children is too narrowing."

The Medical Technology Program began around the same time as physical therapy. According to Dr. Coghlan, "It's a small program but a good one. On the average, there are five concentrators per class."

The program has changed its affiliation from the Beth Israel Hospital to the Lynn Hospital. Dr. Coghlan explains that "Lynn has a very well-equipped lab. Lynn Hospital was the first in the area to put its lab on computers."

When labs were first computerized, it was thought that they would replace medical technologists. However, this did not happen. "No computer can identify cells. They've just changed the way things are done," said Dr. Coghlan. "There's more instrumentation and that's brought a greater degree of accuracy."

MANAGEMENT

The beginning of the Department of Management traces back to the College's Secretarial School of the early 1900's. These students were trained to be private secretaries, registrars, and office assistants.

Today the department, which is the largest in the College with an enrollment of over 2,000 students, trains women to be managers with their own secretaries.

The Secretarial School evolved into the School of Business and from there grew into the Department of Management. The curriculum has grown and changed, adapting to the needs and wants of the times. John Pfaff, Chairperson, states that "the attitudes about women in the work place are changing. Women are slowly overcoming 'math phobia.' We've added a math requirement to the curriculum and a course in corporate finance. Now women are being trained both quantitatively and qualitatively. In fact, women have shown a great aptitude for accounting."

According to a report published in the American Association of Schools of Business Dean's Letter, the number of women undergraduates earning a degree in business has increased tremendously. Between 1973 and 1980, the number of males who graduated with undergraduate degrees in business rose only 9.6% while those earned by women rose 361%. This is a reflection of the changing attitudes of the roles women play in the work place.

MATHEMATICS

The myth that women cannot do math is slowly being dispelled," said department Chairperson, David Browder.

In 1902 a Simmons student would have had bookkeeping as a career choice for her mathematical abilities. With the introduction of the computer, the discipline of mathematics is more complex and the career choices more diverse.

The department is now a part of the new Applied Computer Science Program. Math majors can use their abilities at programming and researching.

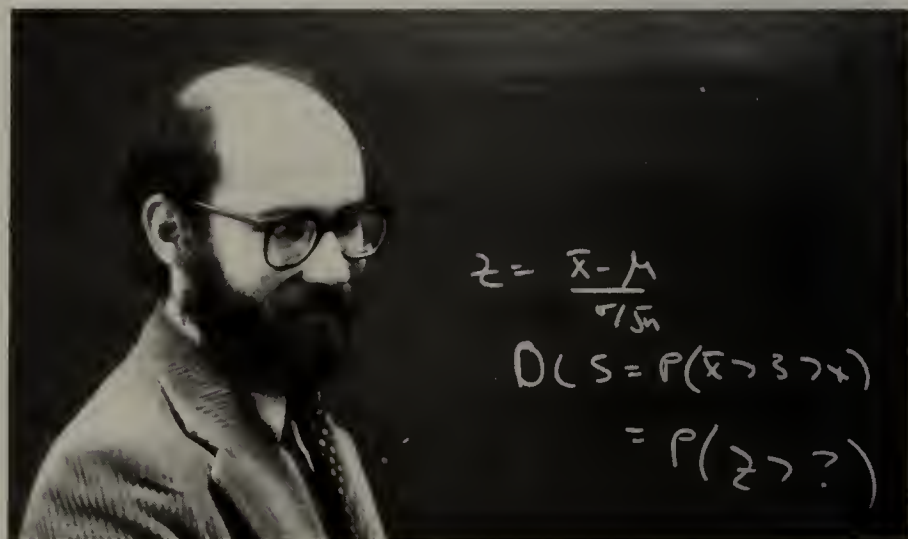

"Students can use their computing and math tools in the business world as statisticians and for making quantitative and qualitative predictions for companies. There are more career opportunities available today," said Mr. Browder.

NURSING

In 1902, the School of Household Economics offered nurse training programs for those who had completed a nursing program at one of the nearby hospitals.

The instruction at the hospital schools was inadequate and little clinical experience was offered. The need for adequate nursing instruction was filled by the establishment of the Simmons College School of Nursing in 1919.

Today, nursing students must take prerequisite courses in the biological sciences, the social sciences, and chemistry. The actual nursing concentration consists of five courses which involve both academic and clinical instruction.

The education of today's nurse at Simmons is relevant and the courses undergo continuous revision. Phyllis Moore, Chairperson of the department, said "We try to keep a relevancy in the curriculum. Nursing students are required to take either Sociology of Health or Economics of Health."

According to Ms. Moore, the Simmons nursing graduate is well-qualified and well-respected. "The demand for acuity and competency in nursing is great and our graduates are top quality. The last graduating class basically had their first choice of jobs."

NUTRITION

The Department of Nutrition, established in 1973, grew out of the Home Economics Department; a department which had brought the College national attention and one which had a long history at the College.

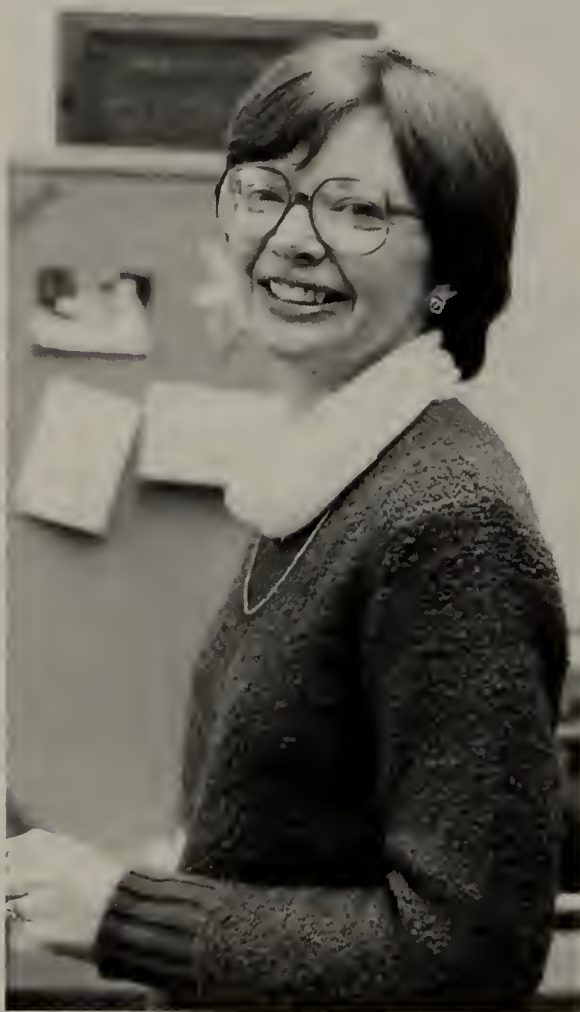

The department has grown rapidly in distinction. It is the only department in the College with an endowed department chair. All of the department's faculty members are published authors.

According to Acting Chairperson, Dr. Marion Mason, there were nine nutrition graduates in 1973. Last year there were 26 graduates. This year 37 students are expected to graduate, and in 1983 it is estimated that there will be 40 graduates.

"The curriculum is continually being revamped," said Dr. Mason. "There is more emphasis on sciences now. We try not to concentrate on any one thing."

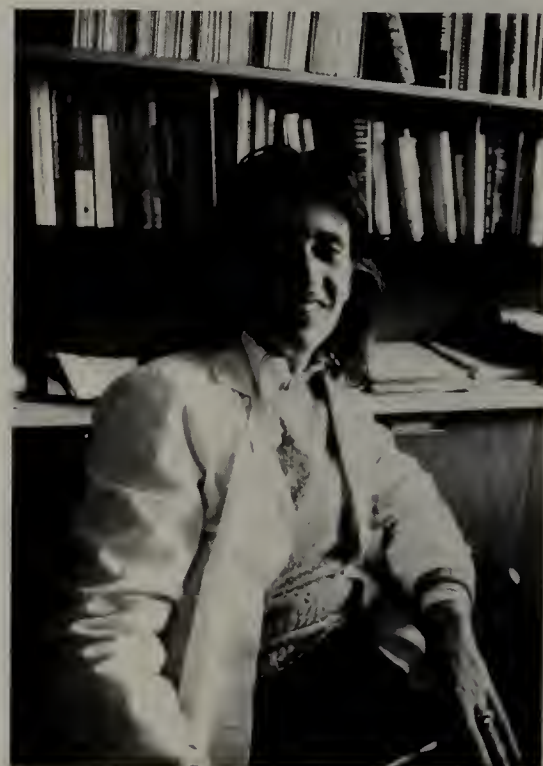

Nutrition concentrators have found jobs with supermarkets, consumer advocacy agencies, clinics, hospitals, public and private institutions, and the hotel and restaurant business.

PHILOSOPHY

The Department of Philosophy was once a part of the School of Social Sciences at Simmons. It is now a department that accommodates student interests.

"The department offers many courses dealing with issues in society, morals, and ethics," said Professor of Philosophy, Brad Art. "If students are interested in a topic, we make courses available to them in that area. We have many dual majors."

The department offers a variety of courses including one in business ethics and the philosophy of law. "Philosophy is a good preparation for law school," explains Mr. Art. "Our students do very well on the LSAT's. The business world wants people who have had philosophy and our students are successful. Philosophy is unusual enough that it allows you to be creative. You can do anything you want with it."

PHYSICS

Physics has been taught at Simmons since the College's beginning in 1902. It is a respected and well-established science. With the completion of the science building in 1972, the Department of Physics got its own labs and sophisticated equipment.

"We've kept up with the times," said Chairperson, Edward Prenowitz, as he demonstrated the use of a computer. Pointing out flashing red lights in the delicate circuitry, he said, "Those blinking lights are counting in binary at an extraordinarily fast rate. We use the computers for teaching and the students use them to do research and calculations."

According to Mr. Prenowitz, physics concentrators have career opportunities in research, teaching, engineering, and industry. High technology has made it necessary for students to have a working knowledge of computers.

PSYCHOLOGY

Dr. Teresa Carterette came to the Department of Psychology in 1964 to develop an experimental psychology program. At that time, there was only a psychological testing program. There were three full time faculty and the department had two classrooms on the third floor of the Main College Building. Today, there are seven full time faculty and the department has three laboratories in the science building.

According to Dr. Carterette, computers have brought changes to the study of psychology. "There have been a large number of changes with the advent of computer application in psychological studies. There is a more specific analysis of data and computers are used in experiments to control equipment." She added, "There have been increased studies made into the concept of artificial intelligence and memory studies using the computer."

One thing that hasn't changed is the department's dedication to student field experience. "When I came in 1964, the department had student interns placed at the Shattuck and Massachusetts General Hospitals. This was long before anyone had talked about the value of field work experience," commented Dr. Carterette.

SOCIOLOGY

Sociology is a relatively new discipline, having first been formulated in 1838. Chairperson of the department, Stephen London, said "Sociology has changed and we have kept abreast of those changes. We encourage students to have a comparative outlook on their studies; to look at societies and cultures other than their own."

There have been changes in the sociology curriculum to accommodate the comparative approach. They have added Afro-American Studies and the Sociology of Women as requirements.

Since Mr. London came to Simmons in 1975, the department has virtually doubled from two full time professors to five. "Sociology has gained more academic respect," claims Mr. London. "We've been told that our graduates are highly regarded. A sociology background distinguishes that candidate from others. They are better able to understand others' research and are capable of doing their own."

WOMEN'S STUDIES

Women's Studies began with one course, Women in American History. There are now over 30 courses offered by the program. As a formal concentration, Women's Studies has been available since 1976. It is a collection of courses that all concern women. As an interdisciplinary concentration, courses are offered in history, English, sociology, economics, government, psychology, management, communications, American, and Afro-American Studies.

"The reason for Women's Studies was to correct an imbalance," explained Coordinator, Laurie Crumpacker. "We're trying to rebalance the academic ledger. You always hear about men who pioneered in certain disciplines. Our eventual goal is to enrich the other disciplines by offering the women's side of the story."

"A student's memories... are all interwoven with the manners and customs, ideas and happenings of the times."†

In 1902, Simmons College admitted its first class. A woman in this class was progressive in her thinking and values. Society's attitude was Victorian. A woman's place was still in the home.

Women could not even vote. Higher education for women, training them for self-sufficiency, was not a readily accepted idea.

She was risking a lot. What if this new women's college did not meet her expectations? What if Simmons College failed?
 John Simmons' will provided for "an institution to be called Simmons Female College, for the purpose of teaching... branches of art, science, and industry best calculated to enable the scholars to acquire an independent livelihood."

But even Simmons with these noble ideals was influenced by the decade. A woman was limited in the areas she could prepare to earn "an independent livelihood." The college offered only four schools to study-- household economics, secretarial studies, library studies, and science.

In 1902, these were the only career opportunities open to women.

Of the 137 students admitted to Simmons in that first class, only 28 lived at the college.

For the most part, students were from the metropolitan Boston area.

The social life at Simmons in 1902 was not at all like today's college lifestyle.

Social events were seldom held and those that did take place were carefully chaperoned. Formal invitations had to be sent out and then answered.

The young ladies of this class were not allowed drink or smoke in public. Everything they did was closely monitored.

They were setting precedents and traditions for future classes.

But that first class shared a closeness brought about by striving for a common goal...

... the success of Simmons College.

In 1982, a woman serves as a United States Supreme Court Justice. A woman's place is anywhere she wants to be. Women can select their careers with a freedom that did not exist in 1902.

Simmons College is now an established educational institution with a respected reputation. Today, a Simmons student knows she will be well prepared to be independent and self-sufficient.

More than 26 concentrations and 10 graduate programs are available to students. Women are educated to be the best in their chosen professions. No longer are they trained only to assist men in their careers.

Social life at Simmons has undergone vast changes. A majority of the students live on campus. Dormitory parties and traditional events have replaced the formal receptions of 1902. The beau parlors have been converted to provide extra living room space and in one case, to house new computer terminals. Simmons events have attracted talented and celebrated people. Guest speakers have included actress Jane Fonda and Pulitzer Prize winner Ellen Goodman.

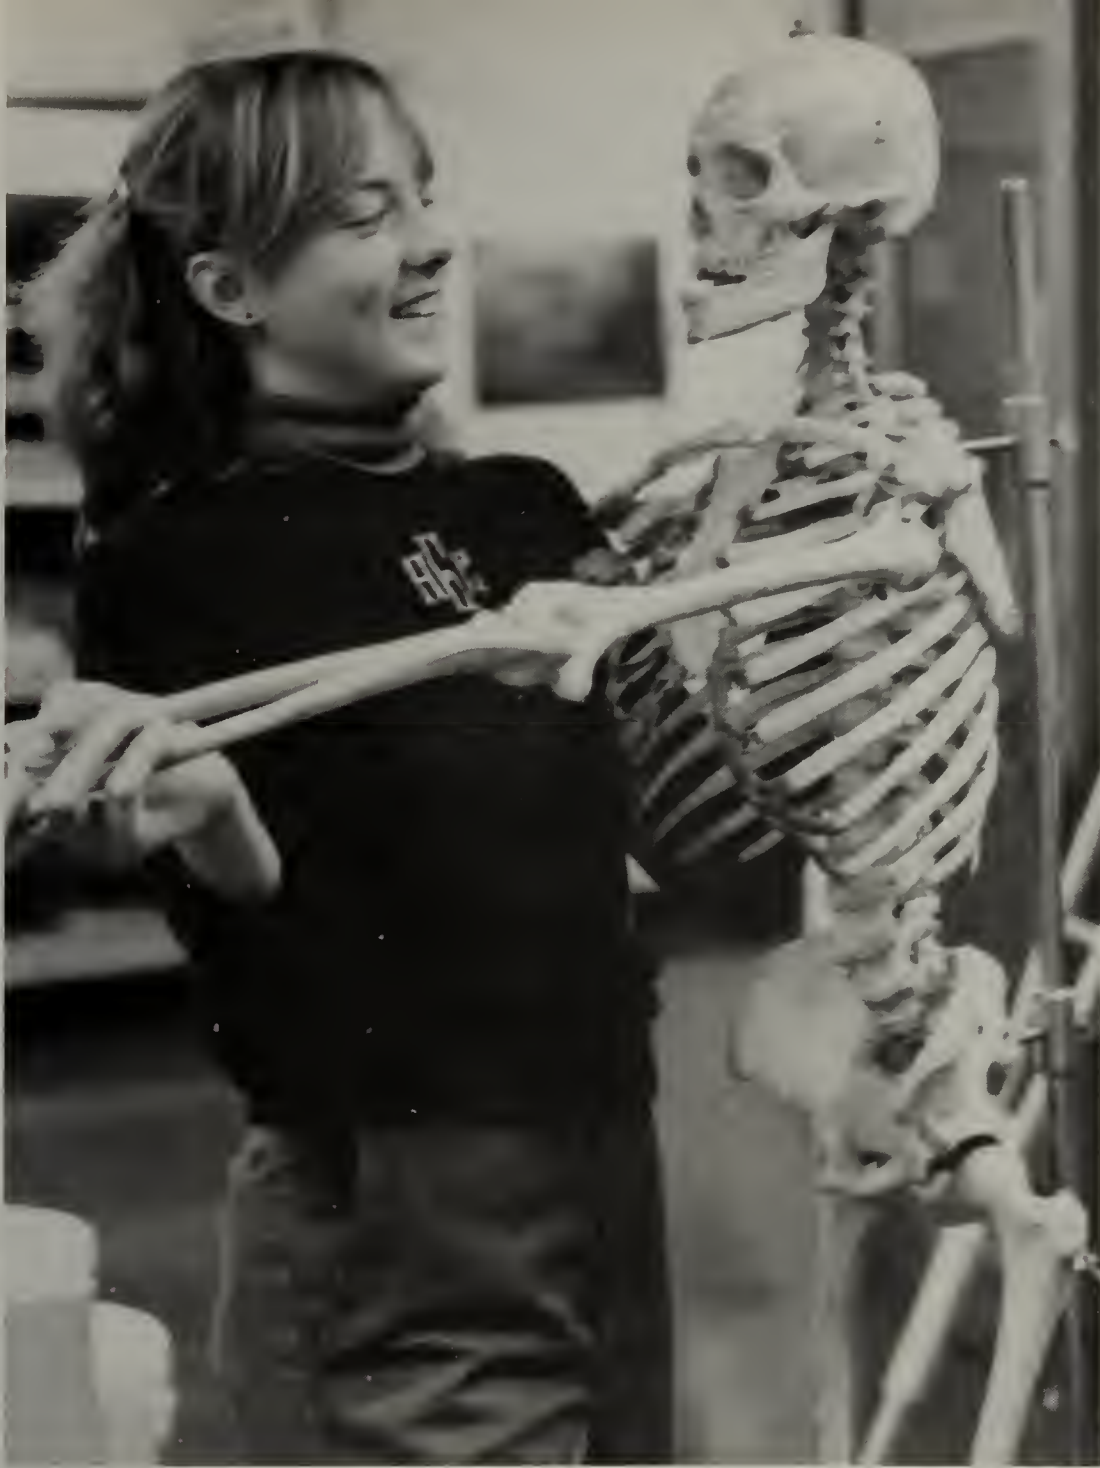

The Simmons student body is diverse. Students come from all over the United States and from countries abroad. Because of this, activities and clubs at Simmons cover a multitude of interests. These varying inputs to the Simmons community enhance and enrich the formal education, producing well-rounded, capable women.

In the eightieth year of Simmons College, 420 undergraduates will receive degrees, compared to the "32 maidens" of that first class who graduated in 1906.

Simmons College has grown and succeeded because it has been flexible enough to change with "the manners and customs, ideas and happenings of the times."
